The mushrooms he is talking about are all real species.
First was the blaze mushroom, which gets its name from its flame-like shape. The actual species name is Podostroma cornu-damae. They originate in Japan and are extremely toxic, having already accounted for several deaths in Japan. Some people were reported dead after consuming a single gram (0.035 oz) of this mushroom. Some symptoms include stomach pains, changes in perception, decrease in the number of white blood cells, hair loss, and shrinking of the cerebellum, resulting in speech impediment and problems with voluntary movement. In cases where it was fatal, autopsies revealed multiple organ failures, including acute kidney failure, liver necrosis and disseminated intravascular coagulation.

Second was the destroying angel, species name Amanita virosa. These mushrooms are once again incredibly toxic. They are so dangerous some authorities even suggest avoiding direct contact with them. Consuming one of these is 100% guaranteed to put you in a hospital, and even when you are there you are not safe because there isn't a perfect antidote for this mushroom's poison (a type of amatoxin) which literally opens holes in your internal organs. If no method of treatment is working and the organ damage is too advanced, your only way out is an organ transplant, otherwise you will die. If the poison attacks your heart and liver then you are as good as dead.

And lastly there was the false red morel, species name Gyromitra esculenta. It gets its name from resembling a true morel but, unlike its edible brother, this one isn't very safe for consumption. This is the least lethal of the bunch, requiring a higher dose to be consumed in order for it to be fatal, but it is nonetheless dangerous if not handled properly. Symptoms mostly affect your gastrointestinal system. You will feel nausea, vomit, and have watery diarrhea which may be bloodstained. Dehydration may develop if the vomiting or diarrhea is severe. Dizziness, lethargy, vertigo, tremor, ataxia, nystagmus, and headaches develop soon after. Severe fever often occurs as well. In most cases of poisoning, symptoms do not progress from these initial symptoms, and patients recover after 2–6 days of illness.

Do not ever pick up a mushroom if you don't know what species it is!
If you ever eat any mushroom and aren't feeling well, immediately call your national emergency number!

You might have noticed the food pyramid is a little different from the usual ones we see here in the West, and that is because the Japanese diet is completely different from ours!
On the top of the pyramid you have water and exercise.
Sometimes tea is included alongside water.
Then you have:
Staple foods (shushoku). These include mostly rice and wheat based products.
Side dishes (fukusai). These are all the vegetables that go along with everything
Main dishes (shusai). These are all the meats, fish and other proteins like eggs.
And lastly you have milk and other dairy products as well as fruits, these are generally placed next to each other in terms of importance.
